

Santander Multi-Asset Low Volatility

5 / 2024

Fund commentary

During the month, the good performance of the US economy has been consolidated, although inflation is still more persistent than desired (with tight business margins and wage pressures that are still being maintained), which means that the market is currently giving a low probability of seeing a recession in the economy. In Europe, the message of rate cuts in June has been maintained since the beginning of the year, although softening the speed and magnitude of the next rate cuts.

In this way, the markets have had the tailwind to continue rising, together with the boost from Artificial Intelligence, which continues to push up the share price of the companies that weigh most heavily on the indices. Although valuations may seem high, the truth is that the profits of these companies are growing at a faster rate than their share price. May thus ends with the S&P500 up +4.8%, the Nasdaq +6.3% while in other geographies the gains are worse: Stoxx50 +1.3%, Ibex +4.3%.

On the commodities side, Gold continues its trend, increasing by +1.80% during the month, while the price of oil fell -6%, with the result that the differences in geopolitical news have not translated into greater price pressure, probably due to the anticipation that OPEC may maintain the restrictions on production that it has been maintaining on the basis of a demand that has not yet picked up. The yield curves continue to rise gradually, with the exception of the U.S. yield curve, whose bonds have fallen in yields and therefore risen in price.

Attention is still focused on the US elections, the adjustment in Monetary Policy and the positioning of the different regions in trade issues with China, which could lead to an increase in tensions affecting international trade (in Europe there are plans to impose restrictions that would affect the Automotive sector, which could lead to responses from China).

The fund's net asset value is up +0.2% MTD thanks to money market fixed income, which brings great stability to the fund even though bond yields have continued to rally this month and we have increased the fund's duration slightly to take advantage of these attractive yields. High-yield and emerging market bonds also contributed to the fund's positive performance. In this context, we slightly increased the weight in the basket of risky assets, and the composition of the defensive part of the fund underwent minimal changes in composition with some bonds maturing or moving to money market but no major movements or bets.
